Screenshot: 3-th order Butterworth low-pass shows the following GUI: Airflow-dependent lung protection during total intravenous anesthesia. To study the role of the upper airway in protecting the lungs from adverse effects of anesthetic agents, the authors compared the effects of anesthesia with oxygen alone and total intravenous anesthesia with pentobarbital. Seven dogs were anesthetized with a mixture of O<sub>2</sub> and N<sub>2</sub>O. Anesthesia was maintained with propofol and N<sub>2</sub>O in five dogs and with propofol alone in two dogs. Upper airway opening pressure was measured at regular intervals during anesthesia with the combination of oxygen and N<sub>2</sub>O. In addition, the end-tidal PCO<sub>2</sub> (PE'CO<sub>2</sub>) was recorded. The dogs were mechanically ventilated. There were three sequences of pulmonary function studies, with the first under anesthesia with oxygen and N<sub>2</sub>O. Each sequence was followed by five minutes of apnea. Each apneic period was then followed by ventilation with 100% O<sub>2</sub> for three minutes, and the third sequence of pulmonary function studies was performed. In the five dogs anesthetized with the combination of oxygen and N<sub>2</sub>O, no increase in upper airway opening pressure was observed during apnea. In the five animals anesthetized with propofol alone, increased upper airway opening pressures were measured. In all animals, PE'CO<sub>2</sub> increased during apnea. When ventilation was started after apnea, there were no further changes in PE'CO<sub>2</sub>. When ventilation was started before apnea, PE'CO<sub>2</sub> decreased immediately after ventilation and recovered to baseline levels within five minutes. There was no change in pulmonary mechanics during ventilation after apnea. During anesthesia with O<sub>2</sub> and N<sub>2</sub>O, upper airway opening pressure was not affected by apnea. However, when the animals were anesthetized with propofol alone, the increase in upper airway opening pressure was large during apnea and the authors postulate that this increased opening pressure contributes to airway closure during apnea.Q: In MVC, how can I implement a switch statement using multiple types?
